Houseplants, the Surprising Benefits of Being a Plant Parent!

Houseplants, no, not the plastic ones that require an obscene amount of dusting, but a living breathing plant that lives in your home that requires both dusting and watering have drastically risen in popularity, and it is no surprise.

Not only do house plants brighten up homes they also provide a multitude of health benefits from physical to psychological.

A 1980's study from NASA found that houseplants improve air quality by pulling contaminants from the air, then transform the contaminants into nutrients. Research suggests that in 24 hours, houseplants can remove up to 87% of air contaminants. Studies have indicated that plants help boots recovery time from illness, with studies finding patients who have a garden view recover faster. Plants can also be used to treat physical ailments.

Aloe, a popular succulent, is easy to grow and can be used to treat burns, skin rash, and other skin irritations.

Eucalyptus can help clear congestion, just snip a couple branches of mature Eucalyptus, make a bouquet and hang in the shower, make sure the leaves are not directly under the water. Your shower bouquet should be changed every two to three weeks.

Please, check with your doctor before using any plants to aid in treatment.
